Dan Smith has been the director of the International Peace Research Institute, Oslo (PRIO), and chairman of the board for the Institute for War & Peace Reporting, in London. He is the author of five other books on peace and security issues, several edited volumes, and more than seventy scholarly articles and chapters in anthologies.

The long-running "State of the World" series consists of handsome two-page maps, graphics and commentary on a wide range of issues. In many senses, the series has been superseded by any of the many free online sources available, such as the CIA World Factbook, which are much more current than any book could be given the time-lag between its writing and its publication. But the book's graphics are exemplary in their clarity. Even though the data may be outdated on its very publication date, I would recommend this for the simple way in which it presents complex information. I would especially recommend this to enquiring children and young adults.

This is the latest edition of an atlas that's been out for awhile. With colorful world maps and all sorts of fascinating graphs and charts this book unlocks cultural statistics--from quality of life to where in the world U.S. troops are to who has the most satellites in space. My middle school students love this atlas and will (no kidding!) pick it up and browse through it on their own. I've bought a classroom set and it was money very well spent. If you cover geography, or anything having to do with the world in middle school or high school check out this book. Mr. Smith and publishers: We need an atlas like this one that covers just the USA.

This book is a must for all Geography students. The contents are well organized and allow for easy comparison of related topics. I use it in my class constantly and is a required text.

It's an atlas--that's as good as it's going to get. It's not meant to conjure any feelings within the reader, it just presents cold hard facts. You take what you want from it; it's not a narrative. You just have to look at the numbers and figures and from there make an interpretation based on what is being given to you. I think it does a good job at presenting facts and figures in an easy to read and at a glance fashion. It's good for what it is.
