Read on your PC, Mac, smart phone, tablet or Kindle device. According to Steve, to understand what diabetes really is, you need to understand the mechanism and the role of a hormone named insulin. As stated earlier, Insulin. is a very important natural hormone that is made by the pancreas along with another hormone called glucagon - which is the total opposite of insulin. Insulin brings the sugar in the blood down to manageable levels making it easier to break down the carbohydrates, fats, etc. But glucagon brings the sugar rate up to dangerous levels, causing the pancreas to become extremely stressed. So, when you consume lots of sugar as a diabetic, you are basically putting your life in danger. We know that an extremely stressed pancreas breaks down like a car and stops producing enough insulin to keep the body going forward. This is why diabetics who throw all caution to the wind by eating anything they want with no care in the world will typically inject themselves with insulin to bring and keep their blood sugar levels down. Other diabetics need to take pills or use natural remedies to bring their blood sugar down naturally. During this process, the pancreas wants to bring the sugar level down itself, so it distributes insulin to the bloodstream but unfortunately loses its ability to produce it, which makes the blood sugar rise up. The result is of course diabetes. Understand that when you eat something, your body prepares to digest it and benefit from the energy it gets from this process. There are millions of cells in our body that need to be fed to provide energy for the body. The process of digestion begins in the mouth and continues further, hitting almost every organ in your body. Your body then converts the food into sugar or glucose, and your pancreas is supposed to release insulin which regulates sugar in your blood. You can imagine insulin as a usual key player that will open the doors of your cells. Imagine cells as houses and glucose/sugar as a visitor. When insulin works right, visitors are welcome into the house and have no problem entering. When there is no key or the key does not match, there is a problem because the human body needs glucose for growth and energy. Without visitors in the cell, the body can't transform glucose into energy that we need. Here is a preview of what you will learn...
